History Shows Hatred Worst Result of War

By GEORGE B. CATLIN.

Of all the evils which develop out of war the worst are international, racial and personal hatreds. The material consequences, even loss of life and property, are of less consequence. Hatred poisons the mind and soul of him who harbors it. It recoils as a withering blight on those who hate.

Hatred of things like hypocrisy, cant, oppression and other evils is good for a man, but while we may have what is vicious in our brother man without suffering any recoil, we shall accomplish nothing but the storing up of trouble for the future if we hate the man himself. Whatever is hateful in any man is generally due to his environment and his education. He has been badly led and had his lot been happier he might have been lovable.

READING THE PAST.

When we look back to the passions and hatreds that have been engendered by the great wars of history we can better appreciate the mischief that has been wrought by them. In the course of time hatred seems to be passing away, but let a little provocation, however small, occur between former enemies who are learning to be friends and the old passion flames up and causes another war which otherwise might have been easily averted.

The folly of Edward III of England when he claimed the throne of France, led to what is known as the "hundred years' war," which began in 1337 and continued with interruptions until 1453. From that time until Edward VII succeeded in bringing about a rapprochement between the two nations in 1904, they hated each other cordially and seldom missed an opportunity to show their feeling. That rapprochement proved the salvation of both countries in the late war.

The Franco-Prussian war engendered hatreds which time might have overcome but for the seizure of Alsace-Lorraine. Even in Germany there were far-sighted men who uttered words of warning. Solomon Schindler, a schoolmaster in a German village, was selected as the orator to speak at a local celebration of the peace agreement. He was a bold and conscientious man and he declared that the taking of Alsace-Lorraine would lead to another war.

OFFENDED THE GOVERNMENT.

For this offense against imperialism, Schindler was compelled to flee to America, but for all that his prophecy was true.

When our civil war came to an end President Lincoln was in flat disagreement with the political leaders of his party in Congress. From the very beginning of the war his attitude had been one of kindly toleration with an inspiring sense of justice. When, in 1862, the time came for the election of Congressmen in the southern territory occupied by the Northern Army, Mr. Lincoln cautioned the military authorities against forcing the election of northern men at the point of the bayonet, holding that such coercion would be "disgraceful and outrageous." He told the people of Louisiana that he would like to see them "take their place in the union on the old terms. Let the people of Louisiana who wish protection to person and property reach forth their hands and take it. Let them re-inaugurate the national authority and set up a state government under the constitution. The Army will be withdrawn as soon as such state government can dispense with its presence; and the people of the state can then, on the old constitutional terms, govern themselves to their liking."

From that policy he never wavered. Thaddeus Stevens, the most violent radical among the President's party leaders, went to the White House to ask the President's policy regarding the Confederate States and their return into the Union. Mr. Lincoln said he regarded those states as if they had never beenout of the Union. Mr. Stevens protested that this was an unheard-of and impossible policy; that the states ought to be severely punished.

STEVENS IS ENRAGED.

Mr. Stevens then asked what the President's policy would be regarding the officers of the Confederate Government and the Confederate Army. "Surely you will hang them," he suggested.

"No," answered the President. "Too many lives already have been sacrificed. I shall ask them to take the oath of allegiance. If they take it I shall accept their pledge of loyalty as in good faith. If they refuse they will be permitted to leave the country in peace."

Stevens choked with rage and then said: "Mr. President, I sometimes think that the strain of this war has affected your reason."

Unfortunately Mr. Lincoln was struck down by an assassin. At that time he was the only man in the Government who would have been strong enough to withstand the hatred and malice of the radical element. Andrew Johnson came to the Presidency by succession and declared his intention to carry Mr. Lincoln's policy into effect. Mr. Johnson soon was involved in quarrels with most of the leaders of his own party. By the narrow margin of one vote was his impeachment prevented. He went down to defeat and the irreconcilable element came into power. They inflicted on the Southern States a satrapy of northern men. With the support of the Federal Army they conducted elections and counted ballots to suit their own ends. They saw to it that the legislatures were composed largely of recently liberated slaves who had no capacity for exercising the powers of legislation. The inflictions of injustice, class discrimination, ruinous taxation and private plundering that followed for more than a decade make one of the most shameful pages of our national history. This, so-called, era of "carpet-bag" government was termed "the era of reconstruction."

BITTER TOWARD NORTH.

The ex-slaves became, in several states, the ruling class. It was not until 1877, during the Hayes administration, that the troops were entirely removed and the government was restored to the people. The result was a creation of racial hostility between blacks and whites which led to a temporary reign of terror. The feeling toward the North was naturally one of intense bitterness. Federal appropriations for public improvements went almost exclusively to the prosperous North. It was the narrow notion that the South was being justly punished for its sins, but the punishment of course fell on the North as well as the South, because the prosperity of one state contributes in some degree to the prosperity of each and all, and the impoverishing of the South was a direct impoverishment of the Nation.

It would seem that the politicians as a class are all Bourbons for they appear to learn nothing and to forget nothing. We have with us today a few statesmen who still believe in punishment of a whole people for the sins of the political leaders who have led them astray and brought them to a state of dire disaster. They still have the notion that they can impoverish the erring central states as a punishment for bringing about the war, without suffering any consequences of the punishment themselves in their own countries. To even suggest that theirs is a terribly mistaken policy which must inevitably recoil on their heads and engender hatreds that will work further mischief, is to risk characterization as pro-German and disloyal, but facts are facts and law is law. One may think he is clever enough to escape the laws of nature, but he cannot because the administration is not infallible human hands.

It is held a cowardly act to hit an enemy when he is prostrate. The crowd always cheers the victor in a fight who helps his fallen antagonist, shakes him by the hand and whispers words of sympathy. The moment the contest ceases all bitterness ceases. Have the statesmen of the world no drop of sporting blood?

As the result of a typographical error, the hour of the Christmas service of St. Andrew's English Lutheran Church was announced on the Saturday church page of The News as 8 p. m. This should have been 8 a. m.
